I have to tell you that I am not happy about the allegation in your new complaint against Steven that he communicated confidential information to me because, regardless of what you believe, it is not true. I assume that you believe that you are only making the accusation against him, but it is also an allegation against me because if he had communicated confidential information to me, I would have had an ethical duty to report him and I would have done so.

[REDACTED]

Also, while I don't care because your and your client's fight with Steven has nothing to do with me or my client, you should know that "a simple phone call" to my office would not have "revealed that Gordon had a pattern, practice, and history of drug use/addiction, as well as highlight Gordons gross incompetence, unethical behavior as an associate, and his inability to be trusted and to have self-control."

I did write an email on October 18, 2021, concerning Steven listing my office as his address when he entered his Notice of Appearance, in which I did state that his having done so "was reckless and your sloppiness is appalling – although not the least surprising given your performance working for me." To the best of my recollection, though, I never made any further comments concerning Steven's employment with me. To be sure, though, I never would have stated that Steven had "a pattern, practice, and history of drug use/addiction" because I never had a basis for making that statement. Nor would I have ever stated that he had ever acted unethically because I did not see any unethical behavior on his part when he worked for me. As for "trust," if you were using the term to communicate that I came not to trust the quality of his work product, I think that is a fair inference from my email. But I never suggested that he was untrustworthy in any ethical sense because he never gave me reason to so conclude

As I said, this is not my fight, and I am not going to insert myself voluntarily. However, you now know what I will say if I am subpoenaed.
